

A History of English

Barbara M. H. Strang

Written by a leading authority, this highly original work should become the standard history of the language. Professor Strang departs from tradition in two important ways. She reverses the usual chronology beginning with present-day usage and going back in 200-year cross-sections to the earliest origins. She takes a 'sociological' view of language, seeing it as an aspect of society in terms of the inter-relationship between structure and history.

The Lost Literature of Medieval England Second Edition

R. M. Wilson

A substantial amount of the literature of the Middle English period has disappeared. If it were in existence, our view of medieval English literature would have to be revised. Professor Wilson's classic study examines the nature of this loss and tries to construct a proper perspective from the surviving evidence. 60s

RICHARD HOGGART

Speaking to Each Other

Vol. I About Society 30s

Vol. II About Literature 35s

These two volumes of essays exhibit very powerfully the humane intelligence and acute observation that give all Richard Hoggart's work its special quality. Here are important statements on cultural change and analysis on education class feeling and mass communications. Volume II brings together critical essays on writers such as W. H. Auden, George Orwell, Tom Wolfe; on autobiographical writing; as well as more general essays on literature and its role in society.

"An incomparable observer of the very substance of our language and feelings." —Raymond Williams in The Guardian.

HERBERT HOWARTH

The Tiger's Heart

Eight Essays on Shakespeare

These essays on diverse themes, by a very distinguished critic, are bound together by a remarkable breadth of mind and geniality. Written with authority and ease, they not only challenge the reader but also show us criticism at its best — learned, imaginative, civilized — a delight to scholar and layman alike.
