

An Editorial Note

PROFESSOR A. Norman Jeffares founded A Review of English Literature in 1960 and edited it until 1967.

He extended the range of that journal and, with the sponsorship of The University of Calgary, he initiated ARIEL which he edited from 1970-1972. Throughout the existence of both periodicals he has entertained and informed his readers with his editorials. This issue of ARIEL salutes the man as editor, as scholar, as critic, as, in these days of various libs., a person known throughout the English speaking world — a person who has assisted, promoted, reinforced, challenged, travelled and who has been a source of joy and encouragement to people interested in literature.

Autres temps, autres moeurs. But the basics remain. This journal will continue to publish articles of good and entertaining quality on literature in English, whatever the country, whatever the period, and also poems and reviews. The Editorial Board has been restructured. Of my colleagues in Calgary I should like to mention Earl F. Guy and James Black who have been associated with the journal from the start. From outside Canada we warmly welcome to the Board George Arms, C. B. Christesen, H. H. Anniah Gowda, Wilson Harris, A. Norman Jeffares (in a new and generous role) and Ezekiel Mphahlele. They constitute our agents of good will, inspiration and reciprocity in their geographical and literary areas.
