Black Leather Night

Smoked glass, curlicues smudges of rain on the windows.
The heavy clunk of glasses on the imitation marble a dull reality.
On the television screen Canada and Russia struggle in refereed athletic war, and through the din and smoke she moves, her black leather pants, she moves through the fantasies, the fuzzy tv screens filtered through the after-work fingerprints of the crowd. We watch, yes, but there is nothing there to remember, nothing to take away,

but see her movements, yes, soft as midnight, graceful, a thoroughbred in a moonlit field, moving through our night and, O, we should,
the whole world should be holding its breath.
