(murdered at dawn)

I have seen the negatives of an unravelling horror developing in the darkroom of our hearts but you won’t let the photographer put the seal to his work the shattering of wine glasses swept from shelf and counter the splintering of the broad mirror fragmenting our mighty dream how can i hear your voice above the jarring fanfare how can i see your face so fresh so clear in a glass of brandy falling to pieces

5:00 am
the dutiful cock declares the dawn of a puking day doors open to deal out the fetor and fume of overcrowded rooms reluctant rooms pour out ill-used children muttering their misgivings

popping pistols and cracking rifles frighten a timorous cock cackling unsteadily on a dead telephone wire lights go out in a balmy bathroom thunder dazzle of a detonating grenade blazes balogun’s dreaded dragons automatic gunfire tunnels tariere’s tameless heart sold to solon surprised in his steaming tub hysterical doors shut out the abomination next door fear kills the light in every room fear finds a place for all beneath the bed behind the couch fear clears the coast guards the route who dares rush upon the menacing machete waiting out of sight in the rose bush who dares peep into the muzzle of a barking gun retreating down the empty street retreating into a rousing pitiless dawn the gun returns with a handshake the machete returns with a condolence card iworoko*

new girls in ginger damask and silk blouses emergent queen cuckoo bees supplanting queen bumble bees come with carnations in their hair to speak of sorrow and joy new girls with blossoms on their breasts new girls dancing on bonnets of limousines humming-bird hawk-moths hovering in flight probe pockets for nectar avoidless afternoon new girls burst into the sunshine of the funeral to feel in their exultant throats the firmness of grieving feet consecrating this narrow house without windows without doors harmattan home of the master drone stung to death by overworked workers

G. EBINYO OGBOWEI

Iworoko: popular funeral dance of the Nembe sub-group of the Ijaw. Performed as the major attraction of the wake-keeping, it features mainly women in their prime. The songs, often satirical, and dances are as provocative as the feverish drummings.
