Making It Up the Mountain below me a lake drains of colour at the point where my focus blurs the water's metallic and a dark cry seeps up through the skiff of valley an underworld scent softened tibia in plaintive song to lost kneecaps leaf trembles blue breeze your touch this is the wettest trail on earth but now footprints corrugate the slope and fossils pair off for balance against the clay my signature stumbling over their intentions erosion knows rain best when its sinews are clotted by sunlight it takes an evening for eyes to forget brittle words below the cooling trees where a relapse uncurls its fronds so many fall away before the peak defeated by rocks pride impatience pinching boots and sedulous roots their shutters speed up as the trail narrows every flower's an excuse for nectar and breath waits in line if you flick love's ash it still glows even in thinning air you knew about the mud warned me i'd falter somewhere along the spine below your dancing hair but my lips graze along your neckline's pasture though you shiver before the summit how can i restrain myself on the edge?

no footholds on top we risk the mind in freefall kissing kissing

DAVID P. REITER