

Disordering the Border: Harryette Mullen's Transaborder Poetics in Muse & Drudge

Jennifer Andrea Reimer

Abstract: This essay reads Harryette Mullen's epic poem Muse & Drudge as an innovative text of the US-Mexico borderlands by focusing on Mullen's literal and figurative transactions between multiple discourses, including Spanish, and the corresponding sets of material conditions these discourses conjure to understand how Muse & Drudge reveals the ongoing racialization and exploitation of African American women and Latinas. I identify a transaborder politics in Muse & Drudge in which shared colonial histories unite Afro-Caribbean diasporic and borderlands subjects. In Mullen's poetics, themes of separation, definition, and regulation are racialized concepts, deeply embedded in the violent histories of racial mixing and mestizaje that are both named outright and alluded to metaphorically by her hybridized language.

Keywords: Harryette Mullen, Muse and Drudge, African American poetry, experimental American poetry, US-Mexico borderlands, feminism

I.

Harryette Mullen's fourth book of poetry, Muse & Drudge (1995), is written as one long lyric poem "sung" in blues-inflected quatrains by a funky diva-muse. It takes us on a many-tongued journey through feminized spaces of black diaspora—that chronotope Paul Gilroy calls the "black Atlantic."¹ While other scholars, most notably Mitchum Huehls, have productively historicized Mullen's poem within the theoretical frame of Gilroy's important research on transnational black cultures,

I hear the echo of Mullen's transnational muse in the tension between the seemingly diffuse condition of diaspora and more site-specific geographies such as the United States-Mexico borderlands.² The poem's range of cultural references—from West Africa to the Caribbean, from the US-Mexico border to your local urban supermarket—are united through the poem's point of view, the voice(s) of a contemporary black woman. The poem references a diverse array of Afro-Caribbean peoples and cultures, to "insist," as Evie Shockley argues, "that we see African American women's identity extending beyond the boundaries of the U.S." (103).³ Yet the muse's voice also sings and signifies from boundaries closer to home: the imaginary transnational social spaces of "Greater Mexico," as theorized by proto-Chicano scholar Américo Paredes.⁴ We encounter Greater Mexico in Mullen's use of Spanish and her references to border iconography, such as the factories known as maquilas. This essay asks what it means to read Muse & Drudge as a text of the transnational US-Mexico borderlands.

In their photo-essay on contemporary Tijuana, Here Is Tijuana!, Fiamma Montezemolo, René Peralta, and Heriberto Yépez claim that the US-Mexico border city is not just a city but also a "transa." According to the authors, transa means agreement, bribery, business, intention, reflection and project. Transa refers to the illegitimate and what happens on the verge; not only of illegality but also of any non-conventional initiative. It is derived from "transaction." A transaction within another transaction—this is how Tijuana functions, Tijuana muddles everything up—Tijuana transa. (4)

Transa is both local and global. While the term is rooted in the specificities of the city, its emphasis on transactions speaks to Tijuana—and the US-Mexico border in general—as a global space of transboundary flows (of people, goods, capital, and cultures). Drawing on the authors' appropriation of the Spanish slang word, I expand transa's field of reference from the mean streets of Tijuana to what Chicano/a scholarship on Paredes now refers to as his theory of "Greater Mexico"—an analytical category taken up in particular by José Limón, José David Saldívar and Ramón Saldívar, and others. “Greater Mexico” as metaphor for the US-Mexico borderlands reflects its diversity (of peoples, cultures, and traditions).⁵ In its emphasis on transaction, negotiation, and exchange, transa opens the borderlands as a geographical and cultural site that makes visible the multiplicity of peoples, ideas, goods, cultures, and languages that transact between and across borders. By emphasizing the unconventional, transa is an especially effective metaphor for describing the aesthetics of innovative cultural productions in, about, and of the US-Mexico borderlands, including Mullen’s. Transa captures the complicated linguistic, cultural, and aesthetic movements embedded in a text like Muse & Drudge; the term exposes the poem’s global reach while simultaneously linking it to the geographies of the US-Mexico borderlands, a location whose importance to the work remains under-examined.

Paredes’ Greater Mexico “allows us to make sense of the new geographies of citizenship in an era of the emerging globalization of capital with its intensified flow of idea, goods, images, services, and persons” (R. Saldívar 59). Mullen’s poem, written fifty years after Paredes’ work at a time when the era of “emerging globalization” has become an era of entrenched globalization, gives those “new geographies of citizenship” a voice. Mullen’s poetic language both enacts and theorizes the discursive multiplicity from which it is created. In Muse & Drudge, innovative poetic language and voice are transa—mobile, contested, contentious, gritty, deceptive, and sometimes celebratory transactions. What emerges from this multiplicity is a style of innovation Mullen defines as “explorative and interrogative, an open-ended investigation into the possibilities of language, the aesthetic and expressive, intellectual and transformative possibilities of language” (Mullen, “Untitled” 11). Mullen’s language-centered quatrains invoke the traditional blues quatrain as well as the lyric and gather their dizzying momentum through word games and language play. From this innovative multiplicity, I identify a transa-border feminist poetics in Muse & Drudge in which the literal and figurative transactions between multiple discourses and the corresponding sets of material conditions such discourses conjure reveal shared experiences between women of color under the violence of colonialism as well as contemporary discrimination and exploitation.

In engaging this poetics, Mullen's work invites comparison with another radical transaborder feminist, Chicana writer Gloria Anzaldúa. Mullen's transas resonate with Anzaldúa's nepantla, "an Aztec word meaning torn between two ways . . . and in a state of perpetual transition" (Anzaldúa 100). Anzaldúa's path-breaking work in Borderlands/La Frontera (1987) famously names this in-between state of painful transition as a condition particular to the new mestiza of the US-Mexico borderlands. While Anzaldúa's work remains closely aligned with the specific experiences of the lesbian Chicana/mestiza, Mullen's "muse" offers a very similar theorization in the voice(s) of a black woman. The muse, like Anzaldúa's new mestiza, reclaims her multilingual "wild tongue" (Anzaldúa 75) as part of the process of representing herself and her story and healing the wounds of history.⁶ Anzaldúa and Mullen use their personal experiences as borderlands-diasporic subjects to theorize a new poetic consciousness of transition and transaction. Within this movement, both poets ask readers to recognize how identities are constructed through certain public and private discourses, which can themselves be linked back to the specific social, historical, and political contexts out of which they are produced. The similarities between these two transaborder feminist writers offer another opportunity to theorize a comparative poetics for radical women of color across and between the borders of race.

Ultimately, Mullen's muse refuses to choose either diaspora or the borderlands as her locus of enunciation and instead shows how black women's identities, cultures, and histories are deeply implicated in both concepts. As a result, Mullen allows her muse to speak from the more complex condition of transaction between diaspora and the borderlands. The poem is unique not only because of the nexus of languages, references, and allusions she gathers, but also because the languages transact between themselves, disrupting, signifying on, and changing each other. It is a form of innovation that comes, as Mullen states, from the "discomfort or awkwardness" of being "in-between discourses, cultures, communities with the possibility of movement back and forth between these different arenas" ("Untitled" 13, 12).

To read the poem as a transborder feminist text of the US-Mexico borderlands requires uncomfortable movement. Such movements—as transas—expand our understanding of the borderlands to include the experiences and voices of African American women like Mullen who inhabit the spaces of the borderlands yet are not made visible there in the same way as US Latinas and Latin American women. Reading Muse & Drudge within a US-Mexico borderlands framework offers new insight into existent Mullen scholarship by exposing possible sites of transnational solidarity between women of color, particularly African American women, US Latinas, and Latin American women.⁷

Many scholars of feminist and/or avant-garde poetry have written on Mullen's relationship to experimental women's writing. Deborah Mix (2005), Cynthia Hogue (2002), Juliana Spahr (2001), and Elizabeth Frost (1995) have explored Gertrude Stein's influence on Mullen and the various ways in which Mullen revises Stein's feminist project.⁸ These scholars look at the similarities and differences between Stein's Tender Buttons and Mullen's early texts, Trimmings (1991) and *S*PeRMK*T* (1992).⁹ Frost and others have cogently identified and explicated the various "hybrid traditions" at work in Mullen's poetry.¹⁰ Frost identifies what she names a "poetics of multiplicity—of both repetitions and renovation" of established traditions such as the classical lyric, the blues, and the Black Arts voice (Feminist Avant-Garde 158). Such work has done much to establish Mullen's place in a canon of contemporary experimental women's writing and foregrounds the linguistic and cultural diversity of her poetics. Several of these feminist critics rely on adjectives such as "mongrel," "liminal," "border-crossing," and "hybrid" in their analyses of Mullen's work generally and Muse & Drudge in particular.¹¹ Hogue refers to Mullen's revisions of Stein's privileging of white femininity as "revisionary border work" which consists of "explorations of the linguistic, racial, gender, and visual border work that created the foundation for [Mullen's] mature poetic project" ("Beyond the Frame" 89, 87). She also argues that Mullen's use of code switching in her early work anticipates her later explorations of "being in a linguistically and racially mongrel community" (84). Frost similarly notes Mullen's "linguistic border crossing" ("Sleeping" 411), "mongrelization" ("Ruses" 467), and "hybridity of forms" ("Ruses" 475).

Even though this critical terminology does not have racist intent, the term "mongrel" has a specific history of racial classification and hierarchy in the US, which is particularly real for African Americans subjected to the violence of the "one drop rule."¹² Shockley notes that this terminology inevitably brings the baggage of biological racism to the new contexts in which it is being used. The language of "hybridity" and "miscegenation," for example, obscures the global range of cultural influences that compromise "blackness" and reduces the text's diversity to dichotomized, faintly transgressive mixtures of ("black" and "white"). (114)

Mullen's references to "passing" in the poem as well as her scholarly research on the trope of passing in African American literature indicate her awareness of these meanings for black subjectivities. She gives "mongrel" a broader definition rather than connecting it solely to the history of African Americans.¹³ In an interview with Calvin Bedient, Mullen reclaims the term "mongrel," noting that the word itself comes from "among" or "among others" (Mullen, "Solo" 652). Shockley understands Mullen's deployment of the term as referencing an "amongness" that is "a characteristic not only of black culture, but of 'American culture,' not only of her text, but of all American texts" (116).

While scholars use phrases such as "border work" and "border-crossing" to describe Mullen's poetics, Mullen's biographical connection to the actual US-Mexico border, the poem's references to the border, and the ways in which the borderlands become a site of social critique and cross-racial female solidarity are largely ignored in extant scholarship. Thus the language of borders, hybridity, and miscegenation must be carefully historicized and contextualized within the "diversity and expansiveness of 'blackness'" that Mullen's poem explores (Shockley 114). Failure to do so threatens to obscure the violent histories and ongoing struggles of America's racialized bodies, those real-life border crossers who appear throughout the terrain of the poem.

II.

Mullen's relationship to African American literary traditions, sometimes seen to be at odds with the avant-garde and/or feminist influences in her work, is another site of critical inquiry and contestation. The struggle between narrative-based identity poetry and aesthetic innovation for writers of color stems from the pressure often felt by writers from marginalized communities to conform their writing to certain expectations about authentic voice. Mix observes that Mullen's work intervenes in a tradition that generally values the experiential over the experimental qualities of much ethnic writing (Mix 65). Mullen has commented widely on this tension in her poetry, interviews, and critical essays.¹⁴ She writes that "the codes of oppressed peoples also have their aesthetic basis" and that their discourses "really are very rich, very aestheticized, very metaphorical" ("Conversation" 45). Her recognition disrupts common perceptions that an "authentic" black voice must be a vernacular one and that "black culture" is defined by its relationship to orality.¹⁵ Mullen acknowledges the importance of orality but worries that "African-American literature that privileges a speech based poetics, or the trope of orality, to the exclusion of more writerly texts will cost us some impoverishment of the tradition" ("African Signs" 670–71). As a result of the privileging of speech-based poetics, some readers associate African American writing with a set of stereotypes about vernacular, region, race, history, and identity.¹⁶ Mullen contests the hegemony of these absolutist tropes and themes by documenting how African and African American cultures have used script, writing, and reading as cultural tools throughout history.¹⁷

Mullen wrote Muse & Drudge at least partly as a response to "this idea that you can be black or innovative . . . Muse & Drudge is my attempt to show that I can do both at the same time" ("Conversation" 47; emphasis in original). In demonstrating how "a speakerly text may also be a very writerly text" (41), Muse & Drudge combines translated fragments of Sappho's ancient Greek poetry which, Mullen relates, "sounded to my ear like a woman singing the blues," with the voice of "Sapphire, an iconic black woman who refuses to be silenced" (Recyclopedia xi). One of the linguistic transactions the poem performs thus takes place when the traditional lyric voice of “high art” meets the bluesy musicality of a contemporary black woman’s voice(s). Mullen inscribes into poetic language what happens at that meeting.¹⁸ Shockley addresses these tensions in Mullen’s work and its critical reception by identifying the poem as “an African American blues epic” that draws its inspiration from classical lyric and epic forms as well as African American musical traditions such as blues, jazz, religious music, and hip hop (Shockley 82). Shockley’s analysis claims Mullen’s text as innovative, feminist, and part of the Black Arts legacy, an example of the “possibilities for innovative, aesthetic resistance to racist or racial constraints that fall outside the rigidly prescriptive boundaries of the Black Aesthetic” (117).

Drawing on Shockley’s elegant framing of the poem within a black feminist “renegade poetics” (117), I argue that the poem, like much Chicano/a poetry, can be read in terms of what Chicano poet Alfred Arteaga calls “border verse.” According to Arteaga, border verse “makes lines of poetry from the competing lines of discourse that crisscross the border zone” (91). In Muse & Drudge, these “lines of discourse” do not compete as much as they transact in complex and intriguing ways. The poem foregrounds language as the site from which the muse performs her transas—colonial difference—and contests the operations of power that attempt to silence her. Paul Hoover argues that the poem’s many voices “sugges[t] the shuffling of cards in a poker or Tarot deck. It therefore invites comparison to Ifa divination, in which sixteen cowries or palm nuts are cast on a tray in an act of prophecy” (62). To my ear, however, the poem sounds more like a transa than a Tarot deck. Ifa divination is just one of many registers being “mused” upon and “dubbed” by Mullen, a list that also includes the blues, hip hop, African American vernacular speech, the lyric tradition, the language of advertising, Creole, Spanish, and Spanglish.

Out of these multiple transactions emerges a pointed critique of how language structures social roles, particularly for women of color. These transactions demonstrate how, as Stuart Hall maintains, the subjects of America’s multiracial border and diasporic spaces constitute hybrid identities through “very specific historical formations” and material conditions (Hall, “Formation” 502). As Mullen’s poem moves between layered discourses, each layer invokes a set of material geopolitics. Encoded within and between these discourses are commentaries on slavery, drug trafficking, exploitative labor, urban poverty, sexual and gender violence, racism, and the commodification of culture in the media. As a transborder feminist text, the poem calls attention to the presence of borders (as literal and figurative tools of representation and regulation) and attempts to work from the space of negotiation and transaction between them. Themes of hybridity, separation, definition, and regulation are always already gendered and racialized concepts, deeply embedded in the violent histories of racial mixing and mestizaje that are both named outright and alluded to metaphorically by Mullen's hybridized language. Yet, to return to Mullen's point, which Shockley highlights, to reduce our reading of the poem's hybridity to a dichotomized understanding of mixing between black and white misses the "global range of cultural influences" that compromise not only blackness but American cultures in general (Shockley 114). To read Muse & Drudge as a transborder feminist text means more than simply claiming the text as part of a new, expanded borderlands or black canon: it opens up multiple critical perspectives that reveal how the text's diversity performs and models the transnationalism of American cultures themselves.

III.

One example of the global reach of American cultures can be found in Mullen's own life history. In interviews, Mullen acknowledges that her familiarity with and use of Spanish comes from her experience growing up in a middle-class African American family in Fort Worth, Texas where she interacted daily with Mexicans and learned to speak both a black vernacular and Spanish. She was "between the Anglos and, as we called them then, the Mexicans" ("Conversation" 39). Her daily experience of Spanish included hearing Spanish spoken whenever I was outside of my neighborhood, say downtown or on buses, and wanting to know what people were saying in that language. Actually, where I heard Spanish spoken frequently was in my grandmother's neighborhood, a black community with one Mexican-American family. We used to practice our few words of Spanish with them. We always exchanged greetings in Spanish with the Cisneros family, our next door neighbors. ("Solo" 651)

Mullen also picked up Spanish at her first job as a waitress at an all-white summer camp, where she felt more comfortable interacting with the gardeners and laundry women who were Mexican and Mexican American and spoke Spanish ("Interview" by Hogue). Later, she studied Spanish in high school and college and read literature in Spanish. While Mullen does not claim to have access to Spanish in the way a native speaker does, she identifies "a Southern or Southwestern emphasis in my work. In many of my works I have sprinkled Spanish words. . . . Spanish is always in the background; it's that other language that cohabits with English" ("Harryette" 702).

Mullen's early "heteroglossic" childhood experiences in Texas influenced her understanding of shared oppressions between Latin American and African American subjects in the borderlands as well as her approach to poetry from gaps, margins, and spaces of overlapping boundaries:

The linguistic, regional, and cultural differences marked by southern dialect, black English, Spanish and Spanglish are fundamental to how I think about language, and how I work with language in poetry. My attraction to the minor and the marginal, to the flavor of difference in language, has something to do with this sense of heteroglossia that was part of the environment of my childhood in Texas. . . . The heterogeneity of these various communities has influenced me, often in complex, unpredictable and subliminal ways. I think of myself and my writing as being marginal to all of the different communities that have contributed to the poetic idiom of my work, but at the same time it is important to me that I work in the interstices, where I occupy the gap that separates one from the other; or where there might be overlapping boundaries, I work in that space of overlap or intersection. ("Interview" by Henning 9)

Mullen reveals a provocative example of such overlapping boundaries and interstices in a story she relates about growing up in segregated Fort Worth: “One of my elementary school teachers when I was still in a little segregated black school was a man from Panama, who was a native Spanish speaker, bilingual, so I identified Spanish also with black people as well as Mexican Americans” (“Solo” 652). For the young Mullen, language and race functioned as complicated and intertwined categories. She identified with her Spanish-speaking teacher because in her town both black and Spanish-speaking people were racially marked as different. Interestingly, although her teacher was from Central America, Mullen identified Spanish speakers with Mexican Americans, no doubt because most Spanish speakers in her town were Mexican or Mexican American. The segregated school becomes a chronotope that collapses the differences and distances between Africa, Latin America, the Caribbean, and the US.

In Muse & Drudge, the chronotope of the segregated school becomes a transa, written into the fabric of the poem through discursive techniques such as code-switching and linguistic multiplicity to dramatically re-enact the tangled transactions between diaspora and borderlands:

creole cocoa loca
 crayon gumbo boca crayfish crayola jumbo mocha-cola (Recyclopedia 162)

bring money bring love lucky floorwash seven powers of Africa la mano poderosa ayudame numeros sueños (126)

restore lost nature with hoodoo paraphernalia get cured in Cuban by a charming shaman in an urban turban (126)

Keeping in mind Cuban scholar Fernando Ortiz's argument that complex processes of cultural innovation (transculturation) are the result of violent colonial encounters between European and Caribbean cultures, these quatrains demonstrate how alliteration, assonance, and end rhyme create a playful transaculturation of languages and references. In this transa, playfulness mediates the potential trauma in the memories of the shared histories of Afro-Caribbean-borderlands colonial violence. As Huehls notes, the first quatrain contains several references to mixing, from the Creole stew "gumbo" to "crayola," which invokes the ubiquitous set of different colored crayons, as well as "mocha," a term often used to refer to the mixture of black and white in people of mixed race (Huehls 42). Huehls argues that this quatrain foregrounds "linguistic miscegenation" to expose "the fact that we, like language, are always already mixed-blooded" and raises the specter of racial mixing as a consequence of colonial contact (42). Mullen's Afro-Caribbean diaspora also includes Latin America and perhaps even Latino/a America, as indicated by the inclusion of the Spanish words for crazy ("loca") and mouth ("boca") (it is no coincidence that both words are feminized in Spanish with an a suffix). The Spanish words complicate the black/white racial dichotomy implied in Huehls' linguistic reading. After all, the term "mocha" is also frequently applied to describe the skin color of Latino/as and Latin Americans. In the second set of quatrains, which appear earlier in the poem but are thematically linked through their cultural references, the "powers of Africa" are aided and invoked by a supplication to "the powerful hand" ("la mano poderosa") and "numbers dreams" ("numeros sueños"). These allusions to voodoo, Santería, and the revelatory power of dreams are named explicitly in the second quatrain as the "hoodoo paraphernalia" of a "charming" Cuban shaman in an "urban turban" with the power to "restore lost nature." Mullen cleverly uses assonance and consonance to yoke unexpected terms together: Cuban, shaman, urban, and turban, and charming and shaman. As the muse speaks a transacultured language made possible by the movement(s) between diaspora and borderlands, the poem reveals the simultaneous "blackness" of the US-Latin American borderlands and the "latinidad" of the black diaspora.

In other places, Mullen simply uses a Spanish word as one part of a quatrain in English, as in her description of an “occult iconic crow” as alone/only and mysterious by using the Spanish adjectives “solo misterioso” (Muse 138). Or they appear as characters in other quatrains:

la muerte dropped her token in the subway slot machine nobody told the green man the fortune cookie lied (114) go on sister sing your song lady redbone señora rubia took all day long shampooing her nubia¹⁹ (149)

The muse code-switches easily between the two languages without explaining or apologizing. Unlike English, Spanish grammar includes gendered articles before nouns and grants Mullen access to a more emphatically feminized language. This structure is appropriate for the quatrain’s theme of cross-racial female solidarity between “lady redbone” and “blonde lady” (“señora rubia”) who can celebrate their feisty independence by spending all day “shampooing” their “nubia.” In the rhyme of “rubia” and “nubia,” we hear both the “Afrocentric” reference to Nubian and also to the word nubile, the combination of which creates something suggestively erotic and female. Mullen uses Spanish grammar to “Spanishize” nubia in a playful and productive linguistic transa—an unequivocally assertive and sexual female language.

Mullen also uses complete or long phrases in Spanish, as when, for example, she employs a Spanish phrase to comment on skin-whitening creams:

if your complexion is a mess
 our elixir spells skin success you’ll have appeal bewitch be adored hechizando con crema dermoblanqueadora (132)

This quatrain represents one of the numerous places in the poem where Mullen uses the language of advertising both playfully and critically, a topic she explores extensively in Trimnings and *S*PeRMK*T*, which devote much attention to gendered marketing and commodification. Here, the commercial jingle provides the tone, rhythm, and rhyme scheme for the quatrain, which faithfully imitates the catchy sound of an advertisement. In this case, applying skin whitening cream (“hechizando con crema dermoblanqueadora”) is offered as an “elixir” that will increase a woman’s sex appeal so that she may “bewitch be adored.” Mullen deploys the discourse of advertising in order to turn it back onto itself and draws attention to the role that language plays in packaging and selling (and “spelling”) identities for women of color. This doubling effect allows Mullen to propose “transactions” of her own in which social roles are dismantled rather than “sold” in order to create opportunities for building alliances between marginalized communities on the basis of difference.

On one level, the quatrain appeals to all women who feel societal pressures to conform to standards of beauty and who spend considerable sums on products and treatments meant to beautify. The quatrain has particularly troubling resonances for women of color who often feel they do not fit societal standards of beauty. “For women who are not White,” write Joanna Rondilla and Paul Spickard, “much of the beauty issue is concentrated around the color and texture of their skin. The prime value is placed on being light and smooth, and such qualities can affect one’s life chances significantly” (1). For African American women, light skin has been both fetishized and punished in the public imagination.

Mullen’s use of Spanish to name the skin whitening cream refers to how Latin American and Latina women are also adversely affected by the privileging of light skin. As Christina Gómez points out in her essay “Brown Outs: The Role of Skin Color and Latinas,”

Notions of female desirability and respectability are tainted by historical colonial domination and by current consumer media today. Women of color have been marginalized for not fitting into socially constructed “notions of beauty”. . . . This phenomenon has had real costs for women of color through wages, education, occupational attainment, marriage selection, health, and self esteem. (202)

Through the language of advertising and the presence of commodities, Mullen's text invokes the commercial transaction as a site worthy of poetic exploration and social commentary. While consumer cultures frequently replicate and create gendered and racialized inequalities, consumption is also a point of access to a coveted American identity. Inderpal Grewal notes that women are not simply victims of US commodity culture: "[T]he right to consume became an important aspect of the struggle for full citizenship and identity in the United States." Certain ideas around "lifestyle," "taste," and "fashion" play important roles in creating an "American consciousness" in which consumption [is] linked to democracy and choice" (Grewal 30). Many women, especially marginalized women, find agency in their ability to choose between products as consumers. Thus, consumer technologies are complex, both "subject-producing" and "subjectifying" (31). Yet under advanced capitalism the creation of "the consumer as citizen" depends, as Chandra Talpade Mohanty reminds us, "on the definition and disciplining of producers/workers on whose backs the citizen-consumer gains legitimacy" (141). In invoking gendered and racialized minority communities in her use of Spanish, Mullen's quatrain echoes Mohanty's question: "Who are the workers that make the citizen-consumer possible?" (141). Ironically, many of the women who would be the target audience for this type of advertising are also the most likely to be the workers producing or packaging the very same products their televisions, radios, and Internet encourage them to purchase.

In addition to her incorporation of fragments of Spanish language, Mullen's poem alludes in other ways to many contemporary realities of life in US-Mexico borderlands. Shockley analyzes how Mullen's poem "conjoin[s] the fragment and the quatrain" in the first quatrain below and assesses the text's many-layered references to religious songs, folk sayings, and the language of advertising to demonstrate that "Mullen asks us to think about the struggles of previous generations of African Americans against racism in relation to more recent constructions of black freedom as the opportunity to participate in American consumer culture” (96, 97). I agree that these lines illustrate how “the blues provides the formal glue that holds together both fragment and quatrain, on one level, and the lyric and the epic, on the other” (96–97). Yet the images also suggest another layer of reference—the US-Mexico borderlands:

dry bones in the valley turn over with wonder was it to die for our piece of buy ‘n’ buy pie chart when memory is unforgiving mute eloquence of taciturn ghosts
wreaks havoc on the living (Mullen, “Muse & Drudge” 135)

And later in the poem, Mullen describes:

intimidates inmates polishing naked cactus down below a bitter buffer inferno never froze over (169)

Iconic images of the Southwest locate us in the desert: the “dry bones in the valley” and “naked cactus” that dot the landscape of a “bitter buffer.” For those familiar with the tragedy of the Juárez murders, images of “dry bones” recall the media images of search parties looking for missing women in the desert and finding only bones and perhaps a shred of clothing or a lone shoe. Since 1993, more than four hundred women have disappeared in the norteño border town of Ciudad Juárez (across the border from El Paso, Texas) and by mid-2002, 282 women had been identified as victims of femicide (Fregoso 1). In her haunting documentary of this tragedy, filmmaker Lourdes Portillo’s Señorita Extraviada (Missing Young Woman) visually and aurally represents the “mute eloquence” of the “taciturn ghosts” of the dead women who wreak “havoc on the living.” This historical and social trauma hinges upon women's perceived muted (ghostly) invisibility within traditional, patriarchal societies and the brutal visibility of their murdered bodies. In attempting to account for this gender violence, feminist scholars such as Debbie Nathan, Rosa Linda Fregoso, and Ursula Biemann analyze how power relations operate on Latin American (Mexican) and Latina women within the simultaneous processes of globalization, socio-economic changes at the border zones, and traditional patriarchal societies. "Femicide in Juárez," Fregoso argues, "makes evident the reality of overlapping power relations on gendered and racialized bodies as much as it clarifies the degree to which violence against women has been naturalized as a method of social control" (2). In this violent equation, the bodies of brown female workers are seen as expendable victims in the fight for domination by states, the rich, and white elites—the perceived "order" protected and bounded by the border.

Women living in the borderlands are indeed victims of globalization's dark side—a "bitter" piece of the "buy 'n' buy pie chart." In the new international division of labor, the majority of Juárez's femicide victims are employees at large multinational maquilas, or assembly plants, where they construct components for electronic and high-tech goods such as televisions and computers which are exported, tariff-free, back to the US. Mullen's "buy 'n' buy pie chart" satirizes a profit-oriented neoliberalism that encourages multinational corporations to locate their factories in places such as the US-Mexico borderlands where wages are lowest and government regulations the least intrusive.

Yet one of neoliberalism's problematic contradictions, as Grewal reminds us, is that "the mobility of capital and goods is not matched by the mobility of labor (especially labor that is perceived to be 'unskilled,' which defines the work of so many women and the poor)" (15). The kind of global factory labor symbolized by the maquilas is both racialized and gendered:

The biggest losers in this global assembly line are women—Latina and Asian women—characterized as inherently, innately, and naturally suited for the kind of low-skill labor in light manufacturing, whether in the Third World export-processing factories or U.S. electronic assembly plants and sweatshops. This “myth of nimble fingers”—a purely ideological construct—is nothing less than the rationalization for low wages, not to mention justification for the perpetuation of the notion of Third World women’s intellectual inferiority. It is not just the gendered quality of the international division of labor that is so problematic, but that the gendered division is inferred and inscribed as a permanent hierarchy that is further reinforced by race, class, and nationality differences, as well as denial of immigration and citizenship rights in the case of the smuggled and undocumented. (Hu-DeHart 252)

The exploited factory worker, the sweatshop laborer, the sex worker, and the domestic worker: these women have become “the unattractive public faces of the New World Order” (Hu-DeHart 251). Mullen asks readers to confront such “unattractive,” homely faces when she muses:

how a border orders disorder how the children looked whose mothers worked in the maquiladora (“Muse & Drudge” 108)

The maquiladora symbolically invokes the Juárez murders and the violence of patriarchy and the consequences of the North America Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA)—in particular, the continued oppression of the US-Mexico border as an export-processing zone for the North and West, as well as a long history of conflict along the US-Mexico borderlands. By asking us to consider “how the children looked / whose mothers worked in the maquiladora,” Mullen’s poem somewhat sentimentally encourages readers to humanize these women and to understand them as wives, girlfriends, and mothers working within complex and violent power structures in order to provide for their families. In doing so, the poem contests and rejects the dehumanization of factory work and the erasure of women’s humanity by both local and global processes.

In a discussion with Daniel Kane, Mullen observes that borders are created to separate a perceived “order” from the threat of a perceived “disorder.” Such borders “define social organization” and “artistic form” even when they are “imaginary” or “arbitrary” (Kane 134). As a political statement on the regulation of movement across geo-political borders, Mullen’s comments echo those of border scholar Claudia Sadowski-Smith, who submits that “literal or symbolic forms of transborder movement undermine state-based nationalist ideologies and oppressive nation-state structures by defying a central aspect of state power—to define, discipline, control, and regulate all kinds of populations, whether in movement or in residence” (3). Shockley agrees, noting that “if the order this border is supposed to provide is in part a racial division, increasingly it defeats its own purpose” (103).

Mullen’s observation about borders can also be interpreted as a statement of poetics. The chronotope of the border as a defensible space and a moment in time (of order and organization) becomes the explosive coordinate from which Mullen can theorize a transborder feminist poetics. Art and ideology, she claims, as much as people and national boundaries, cannot be absolutely regulated. In fact, the kind of aesthetic divisions that separate “art” from “garbage” are continually being troubled or even erased altogether (Kane 134). Mullen reminds us that connecting oppositional politics and formal innovation enacts an equally assertive political and aesthetic opposition to the forces of power that attempt to regulate and silence women of color.

Mullen’s references to the global division of labor invite comparisons between African American women in the US, Mexican women and US Latinas. Mullen’s reference to “inmates” and her allusion to the illegal drug trade in the following quatrain similarly locate us in a landscape of illegality and violence:

precious cargo up crooked alleys mules and drugs blood on the lilies of the fields (“Muse & Drudge” 172)

Mullen puns on the title of the poem, replacing Muse & Drudge with “mules and drugs.”²⁰ This wordplay encapsulates many ideas at once: a repetition of the theme of women as workers; the double meaning of “mule” as an animal used for hard labor and slang for those (mainly women) who transport illegal drugs across the border from Mexico; and the violence perpetrated on the bodies of women who have no other choice but to smuggle contraband—“precious cargo up crooked alleys.” Here, “crooked alleys” works both literally and figuratively. The “crooked alleys” are also the bodies of the women themselves. Mullen’s references to the back-alley world of smuggling, drug trafficking, and drug use invoke the US-Mexico border at the same time that they reference conditions in American urban ghettos. While North America’s illegal drugs may come from or through Mexico, young African American men bear the burden of the drug dealer stereotype in US culture, and black bodies continue to fill American prisons on drug-related charges.²¹ Mullen remarks that the line “very literally refers to the frisking and strip-searching of black women in airports, because they’re supposed to fit the profile of the drug courier, or mule” (“Solo” 667). She recognizes that not all border crossing can be abstracted as metaphors for aesthetic and cultural theories. Our ultimate inability to regulate borders creates conditions of violence, exploitation, and criminality for immigrants as well as other communities. As Saskia Sassen, writing about the survival of migratory women in global cities, notes, “The same infrastructure designed to facilitate cross-border flows of capital, information, and trade also makes possible a range of unintended cross-border flows, as growing numbers of traffickers, smugglers, and even governments now make money off the back of women” (Global Cities and Survival Circuits 273).

Mullen’s social commentary links different racialized, gendered, and criminalized bodies, particularly through the lens of women of color’s shared struggles against dehumanizing stereotypes as sexually desirable objects, prostitutes, and laborers. The poem responds to media stereotypes of black women “as welfare queens, drugs addicts, and skanky prostitutes on the one hand, or fabulous divas and fashion supermodels on the other” (Kane 131). She connects these images with the media’s heightened attention on “the war on drugs, the growth of the prison industrial system, and attacks on affirmative action, welfare, and proposals for universal health care throughout the 1980s and early 1990s” (Kane 131). “Mules and drugs” are the African American women and murdered US Latina and Mexican maquila workers in the borderlands whose bodies are used as vehicles for the illegal drug trade. Mullen's verses are a pointed critique of the perceived illegality and expendability of the bodies of women of color.

The poem connects black women, Latinas, and Latin Americans again in one of its final quatrains:

disappeared undocumented workhorse homeless underclass breeder dissident pink collard criminal terminal deviant indigent slut ("Muse & Drudge" 176)

The quatrain's references transact between political categories of identity created by the state: the desaparecidos or disappeared persons (most commonly associated with the dictatorships of Chile and Argentina), the "undocumented worker," and social identities created by dominant discourse about women of color, particularly black women.²² By linking "disappeared" and "undocumented," Mullen invites us to consider the similarities between the violence of foreign (Latin American) dictatorship and the violence of US hegemony, which depends on the same immigrant labor it criminalizes. According to Kent Ono and John Sloop,

[t]he rhetoric of "immigration," one of the key ideographs of the United States, illustrates well the production of ambivalence surrounding others within narratives about citizens. . . . The two sides of the ambivalence are the desire for productive laborers and a loathing of the laborer who does anything other than work specific jobs associated with facilitating the interests of efficient capital processes. (27)

What Ono and Sloop identify as "ambivalence" takes on a more sinister meaning when we consider the poor material conditions of many immigrants and laborers, as well as the hostility they face as outsiders in US citizenship narratives. By replacing "worker" with "workhorse," Mullen emphasizes the dehumanization that occurs when laborers are valued only for the demanding physical labor (drudgery) they perform and are seen as political non-entities or as a threat to a cohesive national identity.

This is particularly ironic because there is no doubt that “immigrant labor is indispensable for the labor-intensive, service-dependent economy of the United States” (Hu-DeHart 253). Mullen’s ironic critique points to one of the fundamental hypocrisies of the American creed: the insistence that “equality and justice for all” translates as success earned through individual hard work and pluckiness rather than a product of the calculated exploitation of others deemed inferior.

The stanza on page 176 of Muse & Drudge emphasizes the intersection of race and gender implicit (or explicit) in drudgery. Mullen’s wordplay transaculturates the relationship between African Americans, women from the Global South, and immigrants in the US and encourages us to see continuity between America’s classic anti-black rhetoric and today’s increasing national hysteria over immigration at the nation’s southern border. “Workhorse” invokes slavery and/or the blue-collar labor performed by a so-called underemployed and unskilled black “underclass.” Mullen emphasizes the racialized and gendered aspect of work through her reference to a “dissident pink collard criminal.” “Pink collard” combines “pink-collar,” a common term for women’s work, with “collard,” as in “collard greens,” a food stereotypically associated with Southern black culture(s). Indeed, “dissident” and “criminal,” along with “homeless underclass breeder” and “terminal deviant indigent slut,” are racist labels used to describe African American women in the urban ghetto. Similar to the immigrant barrio, the black ghetto has often been theorized in racist and classist rhetoric as a “breeding ground” for lawlessness and laziness where hypersexual and sexually deviant “welfare mothers” drain the government of precious resources while breeding future gang members, criminals, and prostitutes who will continue the vicious cycle. As Douglas Massey and Nancy Denton write in American Apartheid, “By the end of the 1970’s, the image of poor minority families mired in an endless cycle of unemployment, unwed childbearing, illiteracy, and dependency had coalesced into a compelling and powerful concept: the urban underclass” (4).

“Homeless underclass breeder” also recalls rhetoric of US political theorists such as Samuel P. Huntington, who warns Americans that the rising percentage of “Hispanic” persons in the US is “driven not just by immigration but also by fertility” (34). Huntington compares fertility rates between non-Hispanic whites, blacks, and Hispanics and argues that “the single most immediate and most serious challenge to America’s traditional identity comes from the immense and continuing immigration from Latin America, especially from Mexico, and the fertility rates of these immigrants compared to black and white American natives” (32). Like “workhorse,” “homeless underclass breeder” alludes to the flattening and dehumanizing of non-white subjectivity by nativist rhetoric. Women of color are often reduced to their reproductive capacity and seen solely as vessels for breeding a growing underclass that threatens to destroy American national identity. Huntington’s rhetoric exemplifies the discourse Ono and Sloop accuse of portraying “undocumented immigrants as either underpaid laborers whose work strengthens the economy or welfare recipients who drain the state’s social welfare system” (Ono and Sloop 28).

In the case of both the ghetto and the barrio, the social and economic conditions faced by the groups who occupy such spaces are generalized as products of a “culture of poverty” that reinforces laziness and lawlessness (Massey and Denton 5). At the same time, their cheap labor drives economic growth. Either way, immigrants are seen solely as “economic units.” Read comparatively as a transborder feminist intervention, Mullen’s wordplay with marginalizing dominant rhetoric reminds us how language and power operate together to name and silence the voices of women of color. This is the “master’s language” that Muse & Drudge spits back in the face of domination as just one of many possible discourses. While the muse may carry a “name determined by other names” (“Muse & Drudge” 100), she aggressively asserts her own power to transact between language cultures, even racist ones.

The category of “women’s work” offers a productive basis for cross-cultural analysis. Recent scholarship names the kind of work historically performed by African American women but now increasingly taken up by immigrant women from the Global South as “social reproductive labor.”²³ This scholarship argues that labor is still divided across lines of gender and race in our global age, where “whether working in domestic, cleaning, janitorial, or food service, or in nursing home or child care, or as prostitutes, sex workers, or mail- or internet-brides, Third World immigrant women are not just making a living in low-paying, low-status often demeaning niches that require little English or other skills” (Hu-DeHart 250). Now, as before, professional middle-class women can leverage class privilege by transferring such “private sphere responsibilities” to “racially and socially subordinate women” (Hu-DeHart 250)—the mules of the world. Mohanty’s research examines not only the tasks that women perform but also “the ideological construction of jobs and tasks in terms of notions of appropriate femininity, domesticity, (hetero)sexuality, and racial and cultural stereotypes,” mapping the operations of capitalism across different divides to understand how capitalist values are naturalized through the way women’s work is constituted (Mohanty 142). This methodology creates “political solidarity and common interests, defined as a community of collectivity among women workers across class, race, and national boundaries that is based on shared material interests and identity and common ways of reading the world” (145). Mullen’s poem invites precisely this “cross-cultural comparison and analysis . . . grounded in history and social location rather than in an ahistorical notion of culture or experience” (Mohanty 145). Women’s work becomes a transa through which African American women’s experiences and subjectivities are not equated with those of contemporary Latinas and women from the Global South but inform and disrupt each other to expose sites of solidarity and remind us of the important differences between women’s experiences under capitalism.

Mullen’s poem travels temporally as well as spatially or geographically. The poem moves from women’s contemporary experiences of exploitation under advanced capitalism to the gendered violence of colonial conquest in the Americas. One of the most complex transactions in Muse & Drudge emerges between Mullen’s self-consciously hybridized language and her references to racial mixing. In the following quatrain, written in Spanish, Mullen references the colonial history that produced mestizaje:

mulattos en el mole
me gusta mi posole

hijita del pueblo Moreno
ya baila la conquista (Recyclopedia 165)

The quatrain is deceptively playful. The first two lines have a singsong rhythm and rhyme scheme, and the words seem nonsensical: “mulattos in the mole / i like my posole.” Everything shifts in the third line, however, when we meet the “little daughter from a Brown town” (hijita del pueblo Moreno)—the result of the conquest’s “dance,” which Mullen alludes to with the final line, “ya baila la conquista.” This final line roughly translates as “and the conquest dances on,” capturing the idea of continuity between past and present implied by the Spanish word “ya,” which can translate in multiple ways in different contexts as “already,” “still” or “and.” Mullen plays on the double meaning of “pueblo,” which means both “town/village” and “community” or “people.” She also takes advantage of the Spanish preposition “de,” which means both “from” and “of.” In the image of a little daughter from/of a brown town/people, we have a context for and an embodiment of the “mulattos” in the first line. The mole and posole cease to simply be iconic cultural markers and instead become symbols of mixing, specifically racial mixing. Mole, a traditional Oaxacan chili and chocolate-based sauce, and posole, a Mexican stew made from hominy, meat, and chili peppers, are both dishes that depend on the combination of many different flavors, textures, and spices. In the discourse of mainstream multiculturalism, food and cooking metaphors are often (over)used to describe racial and ethnic heterogeneity (e.g., the tiresome “melting pot”) or even metaphors for people themselves (e.g., Latino/as as “hot” and “spicy”). At first, Mullen appears to be echoing the same kind of essentializing discourse, but the last two lines of the quatrain subvert this discourse and remind us that mixing is the product of the conquest’s violent “dance.” It is not surprising that Mullen chooses a little girl to represent colonialism’s racial legacy in Latin America; indigenous women and girls were the earliest victims of the conquest’s sexual violence. Alicia Arrizón notes that “Massive miscegenation was facilitated not only by the social condition of the natives but also by the fact that the conquistadors’ position of power made it possible for them to exploit women at will” (7). To peer beneath the surface of Mullen's seemingly playful rhymes reveals multiculturalism's silent history—the deeply embedded histories of racial and sexual violence in the Americas.

Thus, the quatrain's second half subverts the expectations created by the playfulness of the first half. In subsequent readings, Mullen's irony becomes clearer. Her use of "baila" (dance) to describe the process of conquest is perhaps the most biting ironic moment in the poem. Colonialism as a dance turns subjugation into play and pleasure and also suggests that colonial subjects participate in their own subjugation. The continuity between past and present implied with the Spanish "ya" returns us to the present moment. Mullen reminds us that colonialism's dance is not over and that the consequences of the racial and sexual violence visited upon "brown people" of all shades and combinations continue to have purchase in contemporary social injustices.

We know that the mixing of races produces complicated and important racial hierarchies in which skin color and bloodline were crucial to one's status in society (as free or enslaved, citizen or non-citizen, "high class" or "low class"). Particularly in the Spanish colonies of Latin America, being a mestizo was equated with low class status and was a source of shame and humiliation (Castillo 8). While Mullen's multiple discourses might often celebrate the complexity and interconnectedness of *transa*American cultures, the mestiza/mulatta is not part of a happy multiculturalism. Arrizón reminds us that the word "mulatto" comes from the Latin word for mule, and this etymology adds yet another valence of meaning to the poem's title. The mulatta/mestiza is a site of both history and empowerment. In her historical role, she is "the embodiment of transculturation, commodification, eroticization" (Arrizón 84), perpetually denied full inclusion in both her "native" and "dominant" cultures. Mullen's mestiza/mulatta turns this history onto itself by using the transa "in-betweenness of cultural hybridization" (Arrizón 101) to contest the history of racist, patriarchal power structures that have silenced her voice(s), and Mullen aggressively makes her art from that transaborder space of marginality.

IV

Muse & Drudge represents a transborder feminist poetics in which Mullen's multi-tongued muse transacts between "major" and "minor" discourses to challenge assumptions about borders that attempt to regulate experiences, subjectivities, and aesthetics for women of color. Her transborder poetics represent a matrix of intentional and "illegitimate" transactions within transactions. Such juxtapositions compare geopolitical and gendered-racialized borders, the subjects who cross them, and the aesthetic-ideological borders that dictate what constitutes (and who creates) art and culture. Muse & Drudge avoids recreating or re-inscribing a stable, coherent identity or language through its use of transa techniques such as fragmentation, collage, allusion, parataxis, code-switching, and signifying.

Ultimately, Muse & Drudge is a funky manifestation of Mullen's definition of "mongrel" as "among others." The poem rejects essentialist politics—cultural and otherwise—and instead strives to recognize and legitimate our profound interconnectedness as humans. By recognizing that we create our identities out of our relationships with others, Mullen's muse demands that we "reconfigure the hybrid" ("Muse & Drudge" 158). This reconfigured hybrid (whether a multi-voiced text or a multi-voiced body) becomes a radical opportunity for "collaborative reading and an occasion to unite audiences often divided by racial and cultural differences" (Recyclopedia xi) as well as a critically engaged, tongue-in-cheek, and often sneaky dismantling of the numerous social scripts that bind us.

Notes

- 1 In contesting the assumption that "cultures always flow into patterns congruent with the borders of essentially homogenous nation states" (Gilroy 5) and dissatisfied with the existing terminology for cultural changes and discontinuities, Gilroy theorizes "the stereophonic, bilingual, or bifocal cultural forms originated by, but no longer the exclusive property of, blacks dispersed within the structures of feeling, producing, communicating, and remembering that I have heuristically called the black Atlantic world" (2–3).
- 2 In his article "Spun Puns (And Anagrams): Exchange Economies, Subjectivity, and History in Harryette Mullen's 'Muse & Drudge,'" Huehls provides an excellent theorizing of Mullen's poem in relation to Gilroy's "black Atlantic" diaspora and the corresponding complex black cultural formations and subjectivities that are produced out of diaspora.

- 3 Of her references to the Yoruba orishas in the poem, Mullen observes: "They work . . . as allusions to the African Diaspora, cultures, and spiritual traditions. They expand the idea of blackness. They suggest both continuity and discontinuity" ("Interview" by Hogue).
- 4 Rather than consider the citizenship and social relations of the North-South axis of the US-Mexico border in isolation, Paredes documents the "unwritten history of the south Texas borderlands" as consisting of transnational communities and "movements of people from East to West and South to North" (Saldívar 59). Greater Mexico, like Gilroy's black Atlantic, extends the historic-cultural boundaries of Mexico beyond the modern nation state to include a wider, transnational field.
- 5 I also understand transa's productive and destructive potential by linking it to Ortiz's classic work on "transculturation" in Cuban Counterpoint. According to Ortiz, transculturation better expresses the different phases of the process of transition from one culture to another because this does not consist merely in acquiring another culture, which is what the English word acculturation really implies, but the process also necessarily involves the loss or uprooting of a previous culture, which could be defined as a deculturation. In addition it carries the idea of the consequent creation of new cultural phenomena, which could be called neoculturation. (102–03)
- 6 See "Chapter 5: How to Tame a Wild Tongue" in Anzaldúa's Borderlands/La Frontera (1987).
- 7 In my use of "solidarity" as critical terminology I invoke Mohanty's definition, which "define[s] solidarity in terms of mutuality, accountability, and the recognition of common interests as the basis for relationships among diverse communities" (7).
- 8 As stated in the Introduction to Recyclopedia, much of this scholarship focuses on Trimnings and *S*PeRMK*T*, Mullen's self-confessed attempts to respond to Stein's use of "elusive poetic prose" as "meditation on the interior lives of women and the material culture of domesticity" (Recyclopedia ix–x).
- 9 Frost characterizes Trimnings as Mullen's attempt to merge a Black Arts tradition and a Steinian poetic tradition (Feminist Avant-Garde). Frost argues that Mullen signifies on Stein by extending her poetic awareness to historical, social, and political contexts and the way identities, primarily black female identities, are socially constructed.
- 10 See also Biedent's interview with Mullens (1996) and Hoover (2004).
- 11 Frost undertakes a comprehensive analysis of how Mullen revises and "hybridizes" the lyric tradition. Through her "mongrelization of cultural reference points" she transforms the personal lyric tradition into "an experiment in collective read- ing and an assertion of the complexities of community, language, and poetic voice" ("Ruses" 466, 467).

- 12 See Hollinger.
- 13 See Mullen's "Optic White."
- 14 Mullen's first book of poetry, Tree Tall Woman, placed her "rather neatly within the category of 'representative blackness'" (Mullen, "Poetry and Identity" 28), and she noticed that her audiences contained "a lot of black people" as well as "white people and brown people and other people of color as well" ("Conversation" 47). Her next two books, Trimnings and *S*PeRMK*T*, reflected new interest in innovative poetics, but she immediately saw a change in her audience: "Suddenly, when I went around to do readings of Trimnings and 'Spermkit,' I would be the one black person in the room, reading my poetry, I mean, a room which typically had no other people of color in it . . . and I thought, 'How am I going to get all these folks to sit down together in the same room?'" ("Conversation" 47)
- 15 In Black Chant: African-American Postmodernisms, Nielson echoes Mullen's concerns: "Too much current theorizing about black poetics secures its success with a critical readership by eliminating from consideration those poetic practices that might disrupt totalizing theories of what constitutes black vernacular" (9–10).
- 16 Cummings notes that "readers throughout the twentieth century came to associate African American identity and aesthetics in poetry with certain tropes and themes: 'black' dialect; folk and vernacular expressions conveying collective, regional racial identities; themes related to African American experience; line lengths and rhythms allied with jazz and blues; and allusions specific to African American history, art, music, and literature" (13–14).
- 17 History, she submits, "associates African-Americans with inarticulateness and illiteracy, or with an oral tradition that continually threatens to drown out any possible written tradition that we can claim as our own" (Mullen, "Untitled" 11–12). She argues that "Africans did write," yet because "Africans may not have used writing in the same ways that Europeans did" the history of African script has been erased. To ignore how the speakerly can also be writerly denies each generation "this history of innovation, formal experimentation, of a writerly text, that may also be speakerly at the same time, may also be musical" (Mullen, "Conversation" 42). See also Mullen, "African Signs & Spirit Writing."
- 18 Mullen relates: "I was interested in concentrating, distilling and condensing aspects of orality and literacy. . . . I'm interested in taking a speech-based tradition and transforming it through the techniques that are available to me in writing" ("Solo" 656).
- 19 Mullen says she found the word "nubia" in a series of letters exchanged between two black women in the nineteenth century. Although the word technically re- fers to a lace collar worn by women in the Victorian period, Mullen likes its “Afrocentric” sound with its invocation of “Nubian” (“Conversation” 39–40).

- 20 Mullen says her wordplay with “mule,” “muse,” and “drudge” references a remark made by the grandmother in Zora Neale Hurston’s Their Eyes Were Watching God that the black woman is the mule of the world (“Solo” 666–67).
- 21 See Alexander’s The New Jim Crow.
- 22 For more on the creation of “undocumented” and “illegal alien” as categories of identity see Nevins (2002).
- 23 Nakano Glenn (2002), Hu-DeHart (2007), and Hodagneu-Sotelo (2002), among others.

Works Cited

- Alexander, Michelle. The New Jim Crow: Mass Incarceration in the Age of Colorblindness. New York: New Press, 2010. Print.
- Anzaldúa, Gloria. Borderlands/La Frontera. 2nd ed. San Francisco: Aunt Lute, 1987. Print.
- Arrizón, Alicia. Queering Mestizaje: Transculturation and Performance. Ann Arbor: U of Michigan P, 2006. Print.
- Arteaga, Alfred. Chicano Poetics: Heterotexts and Hybridities. New York: Cambridge UP, 1997. Print.
- Biemann, Ursula. “Performing the Border: On Gender, Transnational Bodies, and Technology.” Globalization on the Line: Culture, Capital, and Citizenship at U.S. Borders. Ed. Claudia Sadowski-Smith. New York: Palgrave, 2002. 99–118. Print.
- Castillo, Ana. Massacre of the Dreamers: Essays on Xicanisma. Albuquerque: U of New Mexico P, 1994. Print.
- Fregoso, Rosa Linda. meXicana encounters. Berkeley: U of California P, 2000. Print.
- Frost, Elisabeth A. The Feminist Avant-Garde in American Poetry. Iowa City: U of Iowa P, 2003. Print.
- . “‘Ruses of the Lunatic Muse’: Harryette Mullen and Lyric Hybridity.” Women’s Studies 27.5 (1998): 465–81. Print.
- . “Signifyin(g) on Stein: The Revisionist Poetics of Harryette Mullen and Leslie Scalapino.” Postmodern Culture 5.3 (1995): n. pag. Project Muse. Web. 16 Dec. 2008.
- . “Sleeping with the Dictionary: Harryette Mullen’s ‘Recyclopeda.’” American Women Poets in the 21st Century: Where Lyric Meets Language. Ed. Claudia Rankine and Juliana Spahr. Middletown: Wesleyan UP, 2002. 405–24. Print.
- Gilroy, Paul. The Black Atlantic: Modernity and Double Consciousness. Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1993. Print.
- Gómez, Christina. “Brown Outs: The Role of Skin Color and Latinas.” Racism in the 21st Century: An Empirical Analysis of Skin Color. Ed. Ronald E. Hall. Lansing: Springer, 2008. 193–204. Print.

- Grewal, Inderpal. Transnational America: Feminisms, Diasporas, Neoliberalisms. Durham: Duke UP, 2005. Print.
- Hall, Stuart. "The Formation of a Diasporic Intellectual: An Interview with Stuart Hall." Critical Dialogues in Cultural Studies. Ed. David Morley and Kuan-Hsing Chen. London: Routledge, 1996. 484–503. Print.
- . "New Ethnicities." Critical Dialogues in Cultural Studies. Ed. David Morley and Kuan-Hsing Chen. London: Routledge, 1996. 441–49. Print.
- Hogue, Cynthia. "Beyond the Frame of Whiteness: Harryette Mullen's Revisionary Border Work." We Who Love to Be Astonished: Experimental Women's Writing and Performance Poetics. Ed. Laura Hinton and Cynthia Hogue. Tuscaloosa: U of Alabama P, 2002. 81–89. Print.
- Hollinger, David A. "The One Drop Rule & the One Hate Rule." Deadalus 134.1 (2005): 118–27. Print.
- Hondagneu-Sotelo, Pierrette. Gendered Transitions: Mexican Experiences of Immigration. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994. Print.
- Hoover, Paul. "'Stark Strangled Banjos': Linguistic Doubleness in the Work of David Hammons, Harryette Mullen, and Al Hibber." Fables of Representation: Essays. Ann Arbor: U of Michigan P, 2004. 56–72. Print.
- Hu-DeHart, Evelyn. "Globalization and Its Discontents: Exposing the Underside." Gender on the Borderlands: The Frontiers Reader. Ed. Antonia Castañeda. Princeton: U of Princeton P, 2007. 244–60. Print.
- Huehls, Mitchum. "Spun Puns (And Anagrams): Exchange Economies, Subjectivity, and History in Harryette Mullen's 'Muse & Drudge.'" Contemporary Literature 44.1 (2003): 19–46. JSTOR. Web. 10 June 2013.
- Huntington, Samuel P. "The Hispanic Challenge." Foreign Policy Mar.-Apr. 2004: 30–45. Print.
- Kane, Daniel. "Harryette Mullen." What Is Poetry: Conversation with the American Avant-Garde. New York: Teachers & Writers, 2003. 129–37. Print.
- Limón, José. Mexican Ballads, Chicano Poems: History and Influence in Mexican American Social Poetry. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992. Print.
- Massey, Douglas, and Nancy Denton. American Apartheid: Segregation and the Making of the Underclass. Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1993. Print.
- Mix, Deborah. "Tender Revisions: Harryette Mullen's Trimnings and *S*PeRMKT*." American Literature 77.1 (2005): 65–92. Print.
- Mohanty, Chandra Talpade. Feminism Without Borders: Decolonizing Theory, Practicing Solidarity. Durham: Duke UP, 2003. Print.
- Montezemolo, Fiamma, René Peralta, and Heriberto Yépez. Here Is Tijuana! London: Black Dog Publishing, 2006. Print.
- Mullen, Harryette. "African Signs and Spirit Writing." Callaloo 19.3 (1996): 670–89. Project Muse. Web. 15 Oct. 2009.
- . "A Conversation with Harryette Mullen." By Farah Griffin and Michael Magee. 1997. Combo 1 (1998): 36–51. Print.

- . “Harryette Mullen, ‘The Queen of Hip Hyperbole’: An Interview.” By Emily Allen Williams. African American Review 34.4 (2000): 701–07. JSTOR. Web. 16 Dec. 2008.
- . “An Interview with Harryette Mullen.” By Elisabeth A. Frost. Contemporary Literature 41.3 (2000): 397–421. JSTOR. Web. 16 Dec. 2008.
- . “Interview with Harryette Mullen.” By Barbara Henning. Poetry Project Newsletter 162 (1996): 5–10. Print.
- . “Interview with Harryette Mullen.” By Cynthia Hogue. Postmodern Culture 9.2 (1999): n. pag. Web. 16 Dec. 2008.
- . “Optic White: Blackness and the Production of Whiteness.” Diacritics 24.2–3 (1994): 71–89. Print.
- . “Muse & Drudge.” *Recyclopedia: Trimmings, S*PeRMK*T, and Muse & Drudge*. St. Paul: Greywolf, 2006. 97–178. Print.
- . “Recycle This Book.” Preface. *Recyclopedia: Trimmings, S*PeRMK*T, and Muse & Drudge*. St. Paul: Greywolf, 2006. vii–xi.
- . “The Solo Mysterioso Blues: An Interview with Harryette Mullen.” By Calvin Bedient. Callaloo 19.3 (1996): 651–69. Project Muse. Web. 10 Dec 2008.
- . Tree Tall Woman. Galveston: Energy Earth Communications, 1981. Print.
- . “Untitled.” Tripwire: A Journal of Poetics 5 (2000): 11–14. Print.
- Nakano Glenn, Evelyn. Unequal Freedom: How Race and Gender Shaped American Citizenship and Labor. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2002. Print.
- Nevins, Joseph. Operation Gatekeeper: The Rise of the ‘Illegal Alien’ and the Making of the U.S.-Mexico Boundary. New York: Routledge, 2002. Print.
- Nielson, Aldon Lynn. Black Chant: Languages of African-American Postmodernism. New York: Cambridge UP, 1997. Print.
- Ono, Kent A., and John M. Sloop. Shifting Borders: Rhetoric, Immigration, and California’s Proposition 187. Philadelphia: Temple UP, 2002. Print.
- Ortiz, Fernando. Cuba Counterpoint: Tobacco and Sugar. Durham: Duke UP, 1995. Print.
- Rondilla, Joanne, and Paul Spickard. Is Lighter Better? Skin-Tone Discrimination Among Asian Americans. Lanham: Rowman, 2007. Print.
- Sadowski-Smith, Claudia, ed. Globalization on the Line: Culture, Capital, and Citizenship at U.S. Borders. New York: Palgrave, 2002. Print.
- Saldívar, José David. “Américo Paredes and Decolonization.” Cultures of United States Imperialism. Ed. Amy Kaplan and Donald E. Pease. Durham: Duke University Press, 1993. 292–311. Print.
- . “Chicano Border Narratives as Cultural Critique.” Criticism in the Borderlands: Studies in Chicano Literature, Culture, and Ideology. Ed. Héctor Calderón and Saldívar. Durham: Duke University Press, 1991. 167–80.
- Saldívar, Ramón. The Borderlands of Culture: Américo Paredes and the Transnational Imaginary. Durham: Duke UP, 2006. Print.

Disordering the Border

- Sassen, Saskia. "Global Cities and Survival Circuits." Global Woman: Nannies, Maids, and Sex Workers in the New Economy. Ed. Barbara Ehrenreich and Arlie Russell Hochschild. New York: Metropolitan, 2003. 254–74. Print.
- Shockley, Evie. Renegade Poetics: Black Aesthetics and Formal Innovation in African American Poetry. Iowa City: U of Iowa P, 2011. Print.
- Spahr, Juliana. "What Stray Companion: Harryette Mullen's Communities of Reading." Everybody's Autonomy: Connective Reading and Collective Identity. Tuscaloosa: U of Alabama P, 2001. 89–118. Print.
- Stein, Gertrude. Tender Buttons. New York: Claire Marie, 1914. Print.