Twentieth Century Literary Criticism

A Reader

David Lodge

Lecturer in the Department of English, University of Birmingham

To identify the crucially important modern literary critics, and to sample their work is a difficult — and expensive — undertaking, such is the vast scope, variety and bulk of modern criticism.

This Reader meets a real need in collecting between the covers of a single volume representative work by fifty modern literary critics of the twentieth century. While the basic orientation of the anthology is towards English and American literature and criticism, certain continental European writers are included, whose ideas have influenced Anglo-American criticism. The editor's aim has been to select essays and extracts which are not merely examples of good critical writing, but which also illustrate distinctive and contrasting critical methods.

The contents are arranged chronologically, allowing the reader to follow the historical development of modern criticism; but alternative lists of contents are provided which group the materials according to the topics or genres discussed and according to the critical method adopted.

The historical and methodological significance of each item is further brought out in the editor's introductions which give concise biographical and bibliographical information about each author.

The whole book is a well-balanced, highly informative reader, equally useful as a course text-book or as a reference book for private use.

THE VISION OF HELL

DR D. D. R. OWEN, University of St Andrews

This book studies the theme of the infernal descent as it was handled in medieval French literature. To the people of the Middle Ages, Hell was not a subject for pious conjecture but a place of grim reality which could be visited. Dr Owen deals in detail with the various stories of these visits and the descriptions of the topography and the torments of Hell, showing how the theme could be treated in many ways according to the needs of the writer and those for whom he wrote.

The theme of the descent into Hell exemplified the triumph of humanity over death and mankind's victory in the ultimate struggle. The greatness of the theme might have been matched by the literature which it inspired but Dr Owen shows that the medieval French writers were unable to realise its full symbolic potential and that none came near the achievement of Dante. All too often the spiritual significance of the theme was obscured by its use as an adventure story and by the accumulation of vivid and minute detail.

A study of this aspect of French medieval literature, however, is most important as an investigation into the taste and the spirit of the age and into the nature of man and certain of his beliefs.

The Fountainwell Drama Texts offer scholars, general readers, actors and directors the opportunity of meeting classic texts in an honest form. Under skilled and sensitive editors, each text is given with the original spelling and punctuation, and is not disturbed by 'modernisation'. This does not mean obscure, difficult to read versions, but rather the opposite—the opportunity to be confident that one is handling the real material . . . each play is accompanied by a critical introduction and a note on the text, both of which are scholarly and illuminating, whilst never forgetting the closeness of these texts to the theatres in which they first had life.

Themes and Images in the Medieval English Religious Lyric

DOUGLAS GRAY There is a large corpus of medieval religious lyric poetry written in English, and this study will be welcomed by all those who wish to enjoy this poetry with understanding and discrimination. The lyrics are treated thematically, rather than chronologically, as this is the most useful approach to those just beginning to read the lyrics.
